The Carrabelle Waterfront Partnership hosted a "Thank You Carrabelle" meeting Nov. 20 to celebrate and appreciate all of the hard work and efforts of hundreds of volunteers to create a vision plan for the Carrabelle Waterfront.

Now that many of the proposed projects are underway, there is a renewed sense of pride and excitement. Many of the projects are starting to gradually improve environmental protection, historic preservation and public access.

Lee Norris, an environmental scientist from Environmental Consulting and Technology, Inc gave a presentation on the new projects to continue along the City Wharf area including a restroom, benches, bike racks, trash cans, an historical kiosk, a floating dock to help seniors and people with disabilities get on their boat are a few examples.

Implementation of drainage and storm water projects by the city continues to improve the quality of the water going out into the Bay. Invasive non-native plants are being eradicated along the waterfront and native saltwater plants have been installed along the seawall to stabilize the shoreline.

Beth LaCivita from Historic Florida Consulting discussed the methodology she would be using to survey the historical structures and archeological sites in Carrabelle. She has begun her research and is very excited about the project. There are extensive Native American mounds throughout this area demonstrating that this has been a desirable place to live for thousands of years. She will be seeking permission from property owners to survey locations identified in the research. This project is being paid for by a grant the Carrabelle Waterfront Partnership got for the City from the State Division of Historical Preservation.

Special appreciation was extended to the city commission and city administrator for their support the waterfront projects. They have cleverly woven together a series of grants from a wide variety of sources to improve the city within the Waterfront District for its residents.

The Carrabelle Waterfront Partnership will continue projects and activities into 2009 with the second year of funding from the Department of Community Affairs, Environmental Protection and NOAA. Citizens interested in working on new projects in the coming months should contact the Carrabelle Waterfront Partnership at 697-2141.
